Reflections on 2018

We're expanding our footprint. In 2018, The Scott Foundation expanded our investments in organizations making a national and global impact, while continuing to focus on urgent issues found right in our own backyard. Responding to the political and social climate and understanding the interconnectedness of the issues we face as a society, we refocused our giving into two expanded areas: Educational Equity and Social Entrepreneurship as well as Reproductive & Social Justice and Civic Engagement.

We're investing in change. We believe that targeting the intersections between childhood hunger, high-quality education, and social entrepreneurship will achieve tangible outcomes for children in our communities. We're supporting programs that provide children with nutritious meals so they can learn. We're going all in on high-quality education programs that inspire children to try new approaches and pair technology with creative problem solving in order to spark lasting social change. We're equipping young people to think on a global scale that can set into motion ideas we can't yet imagine.

We're mobilizing change-makers. We're focusing on organizations that are fighting for reproductive and social justice and increasing civic engagement. Representation matters, and getting out the vote in the 2018 midterm and the upcoming 2020 presidential elections will ensure that community voices are heard and prioritized. We're standing up for reproductive freedom as the bedrock of women's autonomy and we're committed to protecting these rights because of their critical importance to women, families, and their socio-economic futures.

At The Scott Foundation, we're proud to invest in the people and programs that are creating change and improving communities locally, nationally, and globally.

Philanthropists Shannon Hunt-Scott and Kevin Scott launched The Scott Foundation in 2014 to create opportunities for all children to achieve self-sufficiency and lifelong success. They are grateful to support organizations that plant seeds of possibility in young hearts and minds, so that all children can grow up to be resilient changemakers in ways big and small.
